

News

[HealthMatters
\(Newsletter\)](#)

Photos

Videos

Publications

Contact Us

5 July 2017

Farewell to leaders in their field

Last month, we bid farewell to two long-serving senior members of staff.

The District's director of capital asset and contract services, Deborah Flood, retired after 35 years in the public health system.

Deborah started her career as a nurse and spent significant time at RPA and in various roles in the capital works department.

We have been very fortunate to have Deb's wealth of knowledge and experience, which has positioned the District to as a centrepiece of excellence in NSW Health, recognised for developing cutting edge and integrated clinical health buildings.

The retirement of Louise Robertson, director of the electronic medical record and deputy chief information officer also comes after nearly four decades with NSW Health and a number of strategic roles with the District.

Louise has been instrumental in the development of our electronic medical record and to the District's reputation as a leader in public health information technology.

"I would like to take this opportunity to acknowledge both Deb and Louise's significant contributions to NSW Health and thank them both for their commitment," said Chief Executive, Dr Teresa Anderson.

"Their energy and experience will be greatly missed but their retirements are well deserved and I wish them both well for the future."

Above: Deborah Flood (centre) with capital works colleagues.
Below: Louise Robertson

